

Abstract: Discovery and development of novel, new therapeutic agents is a high risk, high failure rate, and expensive endeavor. Tailored for an audience primarily comprised of biostatistics and informatics experts, this overview presentation describes how laboratory-based cancer biology discoveries are translated into therapeutic agents that are subsequently advanced through preclinical and clinical drug development.